THE PROPOSED LEAGUE OF NATIONS

THE PROPOSED LEAGUE OF NATIONS

I

IT is our duty to accept the League of Nations handed to us by the Paris Conference, despite its almost brazen defects, and to make of it a point of departure toward that world-society, that real brotherhood of nations, which dwells in the expectation, in the determination indeed, of the peoples now duped and despairing. I do not suppose the present League is what the President desired; but, against doubtless overwhelming odds, against a diplomatic skepticism well-nigh universal, he has held fast to his primal purpose, and has taken what accomplishment he could get. It is something that the Great Idea is in the world, that it has forced the consent of governments, even though it be but badly formed, as yet, and scantily clothed.

That it is badly formed, that it is much more shadowy than substantial, is the truth. We shall get nowhere with our hopes for a federate world by blinking the truth, by evading the facts. If the present League of Nations were a finality, if we were to take it as more than a point of departure, then we should doom ourselves and the expectant peoples to perilous disappointment. But those of us who have hoped so much during these terrible years, who have almost exhausted our souls as well as our bodies in labors that predicated the end of the war as an approach to the kingdom of heaven—we can only frankly face the failure of our labors, we can only acknowledge the deferment of our hopes, and seize upon the shadow that has been offered us with the consecration of ourselves to the work of creating substance within the shadow.

II.

THE League of Nations presented by the Peace Conference is a name and no more: no such thing as a League of Nations exists: no such thing has been created at Paris. The most we can say is, that a doubtful League of Governments has been put forth; and, practically, a League of only three governments at that. As it turns out, what has been accomplished at Paris is a new Triple Alliance masquerading as a general League. And this new Triple Alliance, if a real Society of Nations be not soon created, will become an intolerable nuisance, a tyranny not to be borne. Moreover, it will inevitably provoke an ultimate Teutonic Alliance of all Europe east of the Rhine and south of the Alps. If the present industrial and commercial order remains, if capitalist production and distribution endures, if the existing occult government of the world by the mobilized Ancient Appetites continues, then the Peace of Paris and its fabled League are but a preparation for a new and later Armageddon, in which two great opposing groups shall settle between themselves the ownership of the world.

That which alone can prevent this future Armageddon is an early and international awakening of the democratic peoples, and the organization of our industrial activities and political institutions, of the totality of our human life indeed, upon the basis of an actual democracy.

The democratization of the world, or at least of our western civilisation, beginning with the creation of a real Society of Nations to supplant the present so-called League—this alone can turn back or dissolve the Bolshevik flood; this alone can present a universal reaction to autocracy, when the deeps of the flood have passed over mankind.

III

IT is the fatality of the so-called League of Nations that it comes forth without one syllable concerning the only basis upon which an actual League can be founded. Indeed, the League constituted at Paris is without any foundation whatsoever. Its would-be founders were so fearful of facing reality, they were so dominated by the mind of international capital, that they did not even dare mention the foundation in their discussion.

The only foundation upon which a League of Nations can be built is this:—absolute free trade and intercourse between the nations that are its members. The abolition of economic frontiers, the freedom of movement among people, the liberty to exchange products and opinions,—this is the sole basis of any real human society, whether it be within a single nation or between all nations. There can be no communion of peoples not based upon a communion of work, a communion of the things which the respective peoples produce.

Trade or exchange is not a mere material but a spiritual operation—and the spiritual and the material are inseparable. The separation of the spirit of man from the work of man is the evil imagination of a false religion and a false politic. Life is one, and may not be divided, in thought or in action, except to our destruction. The division of life into compartments is the devil at work—the devil administrating human society.

Humanity is therefore one economic organism, a single social unity. We are all bound up together in one common interest, in one common destiny, whether we will or no. No nation really prospers at the cost of another nation, no man finally gains by the loss of another man. There is no separate security for the nation, for the individual—no security for one except in the security of all. The bread of no man is secure, the freedom of no man is secure, the prosperity of no man or nation is secure, until the bread, the freedom, the prosperity of all men and all nations is secure. As long as one smallest tribe, as long as the humblest individual, is denied complete freedom of spiritual and political intercourse, complete freedom of trade with all tribes, with all individuals, just so long is society diseased and dishonest, and the whole world endangered. Disunion of interest between nation and nation, between man and man, is nothing else than the destruction of the nations and the men thus divided. The erection of economic barriers is in reality a blasphemy against the Spirit of God, a profanation of the mankind that professes to come from the hand of God.

Hence the League formed at Paris, ignoring as it does the basal fact of our collective existence, has no foundation whatsoever upon which to build. And the first work of those who would have a League of Nations that is a reality, or rather a World-Society instead of a League of Tribes, is to lay a foundation of economic freedom and reciprocity whereupon the society can build. Upon this foundation and no other can the building rise and endure.

IV

THE next change that must be made in the present League of Nations, in order to make it a reality, is to democratize its constitution. In its present form, it is not a League of Nations, but a League of Governments, and a League of thoroughly capitalized governments at that. The nations or peoples have as little to do with the League, as it is now constituted, as Christianity has to do with Christ or the Peace of Paris with the famous Fourteen Principles. The constitution must be so changed that the peoples shall directly elect their own representatives in the League. It is no profit to the peoples that diplomatic appointees of divers governments,—and governments financially controlled at that,—shall sit in solemn session over the world's arrangements. Such a League can only be, so far as the peoples thus disposed of are concerned, a heartbreaking mockery as well as hideous despotism.

A real League of Nations will correspond with its name; that is, it will be a League of the peoples, of their chosen representatives, and not a close corporation of self-appointed members—not a corporation imposed, as the proposed League is imposed, upon the peoples by governments administered in the interests of the international money-lenders.

IN the next place, in a real Society of Nations there will be equality of representation and power between the peoples. The League formed at Paris is brazenly materialistic in its conception of the proportioning of power. It is based upon the superstition that mere size is supremely important: quality is relatively of no importance. Power, in the present League, is proportioned according to terrestrial bigness, according to the areas of the earth each government controls. The small nations are insolently treated as inconsequential.

Until the constitution of the League of Nations is cured of this besotted materialism of conception, until it is cleansed of the devil's notion that mere size constitutes value, until it provides for an actual equality of voice and opportunity between the nations, without regard to size or material power,—until then it is no League of Nations, but a mere diplomatic masquerade of capitalist governments.

VI

A GAIN, the rejection of the principle,—proposed and urged by Japan,—of the equality of races, so far as public law and diplomatic procedure count, was a flagrant sin and fatal blunder. Not only was the rejection a sin against the Holy Ghost: not only was it faithless and cowardly: it has sown the seed of a sinister and ominous unfaith in three-quarters of the earth's population. It has established in the minds of the black, the brown, and the yellow peoples the conviction that the white man's moral professions, his proclamations of public law and justice, the benevolence of his administration of the lands of other races, are all a lie. Particularly, do these now think of the Anglo-Saxon—the American and the Briton—as the most obvious hypocrite of history. “For some years,” said a Japanese diplomat to me, “we in Japan believed that justice and righteousness really existed in Christian and Western civilization. But, of late years, we know this is not so. The professions and doctrines of the Christian nations are only pretentious masks for greed and injustice. We now know that no such thing as international righteousness exists, and that Western capitalist might can be limited only by greater might. Japan has learned this, and all Asia is learning it. And this explains our course in China: we know that we can depend upon no justice, no fair-dealing, on the part of the Western powers. They will divide and exploit China, and thence reduce Japan to vassalage, without conscience or consideration or delay, if we of Japan do not dominate and develop China ourselves; and, in the end, the Western exploitation of China will be China's final ruin, while ours will be China's final salvation. In China, in the Pacific, we must be full-armed and sufficient to defend ourselves. To depend on an Anglo-Saxon-made League of Nations, to depend on any righteousness latent or regnant in Christian or Western civilization, would be to prove ourselves imbecile—prove ourselves deserving of the national undoing that would certainly come upon us from Christian hands."

Thus speaks Japan, the strongest of the Oriental peoples. But the rejection of the principle of the equality of races by the Paris Conference has also had its effect upon the Afghan and the Hindoo, upon the Arab and the fellah. The infamous news is by this time the gossip of the Congo; is abroad through the whole Dark Continent; is troubling the breast of the American negro—already cast out from the protection of law; is traversing the pastures of the wild Kurds, the towns of kindly Bokhara, the tents of Araby Felix. Beyond all our understanding and imagination, this rejection by the makers of the Covenant of the League of Nations has stamped the white man, in the minds of three-quarters of the peoples of this planet, as an unconscionable liar and looter. He is, in their minds, the man who, masking his predatory purposes in his Christian creed and professions of free and equal justice, filches from the weaker peoples their lands and natural resources.

The yellow and brown races, as well as the black, have long suspected this master-hypocrisy of the white man: now they know it—they know it once and for all. And they are biding their time—Asia and Africa are biding their time.

Yes, this that seemed a mere item to the “Great Four”, will prove, if their repentance be not writ in the Covenant soon, one of the most calamitous sins of history—a shame, a spiritual fatuity, pregnant with the White Man’s doom. Until the rejected principle is inscribed indelibly in the Covenant of the League, the Covenant is charged with a sin against the Holy Ghost, and the League advances to despotism and death.

BUT to bring my criticisms to a close, and to end where I began, I repeat that we must accept and seize upon the League of Nations that has been offered us. But we must face the truth about it, recognize it for what it is, and instantly proceed to reconstitute it so that it shall become indeed a Society of Nations, a communion of free and equal and fraternal peoples. If we hide from the truth, if we continue to juggle and compromise as the incredible peacemakers of Paris have done, we need expect nothing but a generation and perhaps a century of disintegration and desperate darkness for all mankind.

Yet even now, in the last quarter of the eleventh hour of this most stupendous opportunity of history, we may yet act with such swiftness and honesty and courage as to restore faith to the peoples, and make this awful human tragedy through which we have passed a veritable door through which the kingdom of heaven shall shortly descend around the earth.

GERMANISM AND BOLSHEVISM—AND THE FORCE BEHIND THEM

GERMANISM AND BOLSHEVISM AND THE FORCE BEHIND THEM

I

“THERE is not a Bolshevik in Germany,” said my friend, as we sat secluded and brooding in the coffee-room of the inn.

I named Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg. “They were savagely slain and shamelessly defamed,” I avowed. “But were they not Bolshevik, in the end?”

“Liebknecht was not Bolshevik,” he replied; “nor was Rosa Luxemburg. They were mad, if you like. But their madness was akin to that of the early Christian martyrs: it was the madness of an outraged faith. They had labored and suffered, through many tempestuous but hopeful years, for a co-operative and truly democratic society: they were socialist in fact as well as in name. And, behold! they stood face to face with a people betrayed and debauched by the official leaders of the socialist hope, the socialist party. It was their cheated cause, their cheated Germany, and the cheated world, that made them mad; it was an Apocalyptic rage that possessed them; but they had nothing in common with Russian Bolshevism."

"German Bolshevism is a phantom," he continued, "a phantom conjured forth by the Junkers and financial magnates for the deception and the coercion of the Allies, and for the destruction of the elements of democracy."

II

MY friend is German: but he is an upstanding man, with a clear integrity of soul and a singular power of discernment. He served many years in the German Foreign Office, renouncing high position and further promotion when Germany sprang full-armed upon the relatively unarmed nations. He was then, as he still is, a patriot of the noblest type, keeping sleepless watch upon his country, working without rest for the changing of Germany into an efficient world-servant and social savior.

He agreed with me that Germany was disintegrating; that the total social structure was falling in upon itself. But not through Bolshevism; nor are the disintegrating forces, the revolutionary uprisings, the Spartacist riots, however widely and wildly they range, moving toward a Bolshevik reintegration. And they who cry the approach of a Bolshevik Germany are steeped in the ignorance wherewith the German politicians have encircled them. Or they are mercenaries of the Ancient Appetites, now internationally mobilized, now occultly omnipresent, and the Peace Conference unwittingly in their hands.

Of course Germany is full of revolution—there need be no doubt about that. But, in order to understand this, we must think of revolution in the future tense. There has been no German revolution up till now. There has been no change in the German state of mind; nor in its politics; nor its purpose to recast the world in the German mould. The fabled revolution that formed the still more fabulous German republic is utterly a lie; nor doth history present an imposture more malignant or menacing to mankind. The republic whereof Ebert and Scheidemann are the chiefs is nothing but the militarist régime masquerading. Behind this republic, and shaping it to their own ends, are the industrial magnates and the Junkers. Dissembling the socialist state, the German republic is but a thin disguise, a new dress, for the old pan-Germanism which, full of all political uncleanness and reeking with universal intrigue, has not taken its first moral bath.

The German government of today is no more revolutionary, no more socialistic, no more democratic, than Ludendorff and the Kaiser are socialistic and democratic. It is merely the nucleus of that return of autocracy for which the mobilized Appetites are planning—first in Germany, and thence through the world.

It is wholly a military government also—a government of the officers who, slinking from public view at the time of the signing of the armistice, are now strutting the streets of Berlin and giving the orders which Weimar implicitly obeys, and wherewith Weimar makes havoc with the Conference at Paris.

III

BUT there are the elements of real revolution in Germany—the seed and the divine ferment of a fundamental democracy are there. If this real revolution be not arrested and thwarted, if the democratic seed be permitted its springtime and harvest, then the autocratic order, and the mind that makes it, will be altogether overthrown: and Germany may become the pioneer of a democracy, political and social and economic, that shall be even as a new birth of the primitive Christian ideal and community. All the inner disintegration of Germany, calamitous and incalculable as it seems, is withal pregnant with this stupendous possibility.

And it is in order to prevent this democratic revolution that the spectre of German Bolshevism has been so threateningly thrust forth by the pan-German Junkers and industrial magnates. Every movement toward a really changed Germany will henceforth be branded as Bolshevist—will be so pictured as to terrify America and the associated nations into aiding the destruction of both German and European democracy; into supporting, under the illusion that they are saving Germany from Bolshevism, a Prussian state socialism which is nothing else than a militarist autocracy.

Germany is deliberately and boldly preparing just such a trap—a trap, planetary in its scope and infernal in its effects upon political humanity, whereunto the Allied peace-makers, their feet full of confusion, have day by day been stumbling. And if once the trap closes upon them, if once the Allies follow the strong delusion that makes them the destroyers of German democracy, then the future Prussian re-organization of Europe and Western Asia, from the port of Calais to the gates of India, is assured; then out of the whelming general chaos already on its way, and whether its years be two or five or twenty, the German Iron Age will emerge; and Germany will have won the war and have conquered the Continent of Europe, with West Asia and Africa at her feet.

IV

THIS new German menace is no distempered watchman's dream. The German preparation for the war, not believed in nor heeded until the barbarous hordes sprang upon the astonished and unprepared nations, expecting to paralyse and subdue them by such quick murder, such theft and rapine, as history has never known—this German military assault now shrinks into the incidental before the immeasurably vaster German menace which will soon be loosed, for God knows how long, upon an again unexpectant and unready world.

For, notwithstanding the seeming severity of the terms imposed by the Conference, Germany counts that she has not lost the war—eventually. Nor has she—as we shall in due time see.

Nor now does it matter whether, precipitated into final panic by the pressure of the bestirred peoples, the Conference renders terms to Germany that shall be vindictive and destructive, or whether the terms be so moderated as to be acceptable to the government at Weimar: in either case, the Germany that made the war has potentially won it.

If—as is improbable—she refuses to sign, she will call the German peoples to the defence of the fatherland; and the call will be heeded, even though a period of national disintegration intervene; or, if she sign the terms, she will not keep them; nor will any intention of keeping them be implicit in her signature. And while she is gaining time by her pretended acquiescence, the government of Ebert and Scheidemann may be able to effect the destruction of the German democracy represented by such men as Dr. Muehlton and Professor Foerster, and to lay the foundations of a State Socialist autocracy; which autocracy, enleagued with a Germanized Bolshevik Russia, may extend its dominion throughout Europe and Western Asia.

BUT during the war, also, and watchful and formative of every ebb and flow of victory between the Allies and the Central Powers, certain international forces, so materially and psychically powerful as to be almost almighty, worked sleeplessly to shape the war's end to Germany's advantage. Since the signing of the armistice, these same forces, working by ways occult but no less pervasive and effectual, have pervaded the Peace Conference.

The armistice was, so far as America and the associated nations are concerned, a blunder which our generation may not repair. Nor have I spoken with a single authentic German—especially among those who had hoped that the war would result in the birth of a German democracy—who does not frankly and sorrowfully agree with this opinion. Doubtless were saved, for the moment, many thousands of lives—of lives very precious too—that the finishing of the war and the actual defeat of Germany would have required. But, in one manner and another, unnumbered millions of lives, and years of unimaginable human suffering and confusion, may be the price of the comparatively few lives that were saved by the halt of the associated armies upon the threshold of victory.

The moment America and the associated nations consented to the armistice, that moment the vantage-ground for the negotiations of peace was occupied by Germany. At that moment, Germany was left in a position to effect an eventual recovery of what she had lost by the war, and to plan for mighty additions to that recovery. Her armies would claim that they had never been defeated. The fatherland, in which was heaped or hid the loot of territories reaching from the walls of Paris to the lands beyond the Caucasus, had not been invaded. German spies and agents, schooled and skilled in a devilry still unintelligible to Anglo-Saxons, were and still are employed in every nation's diplomatic and consular service, in every religion's missions and ministries.

And these are now engaged in secretly directing and shaping the general revolutionary movement. They are foully infecting each nation's efforts towards social reconstruction, everywhere poisoning the purposes and perverting the organisations of labor. Just as they wrought the ruin of Russia, just as they wrought the treason and disgrace of international socialism, so they are now engaged in the destruction of such meagre moral foundations as remain underneath European or Western civilisation; and they are also preparing an enveloping chaos for the Asian and African continents. Germany expects that, once the dissolution of the world is accomplished, she will reshape it according to her evil heart's desire.

VI

I HAVE said that certain great forces have steadily and occultly worked for a German peace. But I mean, in fact, one force—an international finance to which all other forces hostile to the freedom of nations and of the individual soul are contributory. The influence of this finance has permeated the Conference, delaying its decisions, increasing division between people and people, between class and class, between peace-makers and peace-makers, in order to achieve two definite ends; which two ends are one and the same.

The first end is so to manipulate the minds of the peace-makers, of their hordes of retainers and “experts,” as to bring about, if possible, a peace that will not be destructive to industrial Germany. The second end is so to delay the Russian question, so to complicate and thwart every proposed solution, that, at last, either during or after the Peace Conference, a recognition of the Bolshevik power as the de facto government of Russia may seem the only possible solution.

BUT why, it will be asked, should an international finance desire a peace favorable to Germany? And why, above all, should this finance assist a Bolshevist Russia? I will answer the two questions in their order.

First: Germany's recovery means autocracy; and the concessionnaires have always been on the side of autocratic government. The desired autocracy might be managed, it is true, by forms apparently republican. But downright autocracy is the international concessionnaire's preferable and most nurturing element.

Now the whole mentality of the German governing class, and the whole mind of the German people as well, is moulded by and for the autocratic mood and method. There is no democratic past in Germany, either in experience or aspiration; nor, prior to the war, was there any seed or promise of democracy. Nor is there any essential difference between the government of the Kaiser and the Junkers and that of the fabled German Social Democracy. The Marxian is just as autocratic as the Junker, and believes just as little in democracy. The program of German socialism is, as certainly as the divine right to rule which the Kaiser proclaimed, based upon sheer might. Both official and theoretical German socialism is just as much the enemy of democracy, just as much the enemy of essential socialism, just as much the enemy of an actual social freedom, just as much the enemy of the right of the human soul to fulfill itself, as the Kaiser and the Junker.

Had the Marxians prevailed in Prussia, before the war, the nature or substance of the state would have undergone little change; and what change it would have undergone would have been freedom's decrease and not its increase. A collectivist autocracy would have been established in place of the autocracy of the Junkers and the dynasty; and the German peoples would have obeyed the Marxian autocracy and its iron rule with the same docility wherewith they had obeyed the rule of the Prussian.

And the social democracy of Germany, had it come into power, would have been nothing more or less than a supremely capitalist state. Thus the Kaiser and the industrial magnates had nothing to fear from the fabled social democrat. And thus the international finance whereof I speak has everything to gain and nothing to lose by the support which it renders to the socialist republic of Ebert and Scheidemann. Furthermore, there is an expectation, not only among financiers, but among all reactionary forces, that the chaos fast coming upon Europe will dissolve even the semblance of democratic institutions, and all democratic hopes as well; and that Germany—the old régime riding into power upon the reactionary tide—will gather all Europe under her protecting wings. It is hoped that the several peoples, despairing of order elsewhere and elsewhere, will turn to Prussia as possessing the only restraining and reconstructive power in Europe. And when that expectation is realised, then the Ancient Appetites will have their fill.

Second: The support of Bolshevism by the Appetites therefore becomes logical. The Appetites are right in their calculation that it is democracy that Bolshevism will destroy, and autocracy that Bolshevism will provide with a long and strong renaissance. Bolshevism—the inevitable Nemesis of a century of increasing materialism in human faith and action—the Nemesis, also, of a faithless and phrase-mongering democracy—is freedom's most mendacious yet alluring enemy. The Bolshevik dictatorship of the proletaire is nothing else than the enslavement of the proletaire—is the eventual harnessing of the proletaire to the triumphal chariot of the financier. Hence the American millionaires who have been contributing to the Russian Bolshevik cause have been acting exactly according to an evilly enlightened self-interest.

I do not mean, from what I have said in my answer to these two questions, that all financiers are plotting for this Bolshevik devastation as preparatory to a Prussianization of Europe and Asia and Africa. There are chiefs of great financial institutions who are today bowed down with a foreknowledge of the universal terror drawing near, and who would, I am certain, gladly sacrifice their lives and possessions to turn back the terror. There are splendid and upstanding Americans, such as Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip of New York, who would spend themselves willingly to deliver the world from that German dominion which Bolshevism is preparing. Or one has only to read Mr. Clarence W. Barron's book on "War and Finance," to discern how a man who has given his life to the study of financial problems presents a uniquely spiritual and well-nigh apocalyptic understanding of the German menace and the present peril of mankind.

But even such as these, with all the material and spiritual resources they may be able to marshal, are not sufficient unless the understanding peoples are behind and supporting them.

And the Bolshevism that is Russian and real, if it be not understandingly interpreted and conquered by the democratic peoples, can have no other end than this—a tide of reaction whereon the Prussian shall ride into planetary power, possessing and exploiting, for a long time to come, the nations whose representatives at Paris were but able to prove, as it has not been proved in two thousand years, how the opportunity of man may be immeasurably greater than man himself.

WHICH SHALL REMAKE THE PEACE—
GERMANY OR DEMOCRACY?

WHICH SHALL REMAKE THE PEACE—GERMANY OR DEMOCRACY?

I

WITHOUT discussing whether American Senators hostile to the Peace of Paris be inspired by patriotism or party politics, no matter whether high or low their motives, their present action will prove of advantage only to the German and the Bolshevik.

I am myself among those who see no permanent peace coming out of Paris. I see no fellowship of democratic peoples, no true Society of Nations, provided by the Covenant which the Conference has adopted. But, though the Peace be provisional only, though the League be far from the Society of Nations for which we hoped, nothing can be gained by the Allied peoples through delay in confirming the work, imperfect as it is, of the Conference. On the contrary, by rejection or delay, everything for which we fought, both in the war and since the armistice, may be lost. Moreover, if the Treaty and the Covenant be accepted and ratified immediately—especially with a clear understanding, on the part of the democratic peoples, of the merely rudimentary or germinal character of these instruments—they can hence be changed and developed into a durable peace, and a Society of Nations may yet take the place of the League for Dominion which issues from Paris.

The present peace is all that can be expected from the Conference, constituted as it is; and it is the best that can be expected from existing governments. It is the Peace of Paris, for the moment, or no peace at all—perhaps for more than one generation. If we accept this Peace, however provisionally, we may at least hope that sanity will come to a world which has been for a long time, even for many years before the war, without sanity or sense or true progress. To reject it, or to delay its confirmation, means the disintegration of a civilisation already shattered to its foundations, and sick with every civil and social disease.

I know that international despair prevails; it would seem as if no faith were discoverable upon the earth. Yet, terrible as the human plight is, black and deep and wide as is the abyss upon which we seem to be brinked, there is withal a ground of hope beneath our feet that has never been there before; and, strangely and paradoxically enough, we may behold, if we have discerning eyes, a braver immediate prospect than has hitherto been ours.

For it is certain that the world will never go back to where it was before the war; the old order can never be restored; nothing less than a free, federate and truly socialised world will henceforth content mankind; and upon this certainty we may internationally proceed.

II

THE future, however, depends upon this: will the democratic peoples, having provisionally accepted the Peace of Paris, then awake quickly and act collectively—act with clear and purposeful heads, with clean and resolute souls? Will they see and resolve upon a course of reconstruction that cancels the peril of an international Bolshevik revolution and class dictatorship on the one side, and prevents a reversion to reactionary and merely capitalist social control on the other? It is between these two perils, each menacing the world with unimaginable miseries and tyrannies, that democracy must now shape its course—the only course that leads to the world's nobler remaking.

And if now we clear-sightedly and courageously prepare and walk the democratic way, it may well be we shall be wondrously re-enforced: it may be we shall indeed find that they who fight for us are more than they that be against us. We may find that the millions who sacrificially died are now valiantly with us in our struggle for the new world wherewith so many of them were envisioned. We may find that the war's physical and moral devastations, that the hate and the hatefulness which seem to have permeated and degraded the world since the signing of the armistice, that the seeming universal breakdown of truth and fidelity and all spiritual decency,—that all these are but the harvest of a manifold ancient wickedness, now to be gathered and cast into the unquenchable fire. And it may be, finally, that just as the war, which so few foresaw or believed possible, was the precipitation of history's black passions and forces, so now a collective resolution and consecration of the democratic peoples may predicate a great and unprecedented precipitation of universal goodwill and spiritual power.

III

IF the peoples who hold to the democratic hope fail in this their hour of trial, if they fail to charge themselves with the radical remaking of the Peace of Paris, then Germany will make the new peace, and, after a time of chaos, eventually reorganize Europe. Her pattern is already prepared, and the weaving thereof will soon be proceeding.

She will not proceed in the open and directly. Her plans for procuring the new peace will be of the precise moral order of her preparations for war before August, 1914.

She will subsidize and intensively cultivate now, as she has hitherto subsidized and cultivated, every subversive or disintegrating movement throughout Europe, Asia and Africa—and in America also. The Bolshevism which she fostered in Russia, and which keeps for Germany her Eastern gates, will be secretly spread abroad by her agencies. China, Afghanistan and India are examples of a Bolshevik propaganda,—resourced by Germany,—which may permeate and persuade the entire Mohammedan world. Her policy now, as before, will be to ruin the world, in order to remake it according to the German pattern, to exploit and rule it according to the German mind.

This is in Germany's program, whether the peace be signed or not. But if America refuse to confirm the peace, thus practically nullifying the total work of the Paris Conference, then the German program will have the free course it could not have if the Peace, imperfect as it is, were provisionally established.

IV

BUT the chief agency which Germany will use for yet procuring a peace according to her liking is the official Socialist Movement.

In each of the Allied countries, as well as in the Central Empires and in Russia, the majority of the Socialist parties continually sought, during the war, a peace measurably favorable to Germany. These parties were at once the refuge of the pacifist element in all nations, and the focal places of German intrigue. In Germany itself, the Kaiser and the government had no more consistent and faithful supporters than the Social-Democratic party; without the support of this party, Germany could not have begun or continued the war. In France, Socialist leaders like Jean Longuet and Marcel Cachin worked for a negotiated peace from the war's beginning; they also worked for the restoration of the old International—which was international only in name and altogether German in fact. In Italy, only in times of serious national crisis did the Socialist leaders render a nominal support to the prosecution of the war. In England, the Independent Labor Party, officially in the ascendant and chiefly pacifist, plotted for a peace of compromises. The American Socialist Party was honestly and frankly pro-German.

Thus the rare leaders who were possessed of real statesmanship—such as the truly great Hyndman of England and Vandervelde of Belgium—were forced to stand forth against the International Socialism in which they themselves had played so great a part. In America, such men as Walling and Spargo, Bohn and Stokes, as well as the humble writer of these words, were compelled to withdraw from the Socialist party.

THE German dominance is understandable enough. It was from Germany that Socialism came. From Germany came the great dogmatists of materialism, Marx and Engels; and they came so Prussianly as to impose themselves upon all political and labor movements making for radical and revolutionary change.

Socialism was not born in Germany, it is true, but in France, fathered by Saint-Simon and Fourier, and with much of the inspiration and purpose of primitive Christianity. But the French movement was first discredited and then seized upon by the German dogmatists; and, like every movement that has gone to Berlin, it underwent the Prussian debasement and took on the Prussian image. Hence International Socialism, so far as its official or recognized parties count, so far as its Marxian basis is concerned, has ever been Prussian in its mentality; and it has ever proceeded upon a program essentially an amplification of the Hegelian or Prussian state. Its claim to be socialist, its claim to be democratic, has been sheerest self-deception and a stupendous imposture upon international labor and radicalism.

Bismarck himself, even in his time, came to value and patronise the Social Democratic Party of Germany as a means toward the accomplishment of his imperial capitalist ends. And, since the beginning of the war, the German government has been able to use Socialist parties, in all the Allied nations except Belgium, for the propaganda of Germanism. This is denied, of course, by the official leaders; but it is no less true—no less true that the negotiated peace which Socialist leaders either secretly or openly worked for has been a peace acceptable to Germany. And today all these parties are preparing for the remaking of a peace according to the German desire.

VI

THE Peace of Paris will have to be remade—this I have already declared—but it is of supreme importance to the human future that it shall be made by democracy and not by existing International Socialism—the Socialism which has proved itself faithless and incompetent in both war and peace, and whose Marxian program, notwithstanding its revolutionary jargon, is patterned precisely upon the capitalist politic and the Prussian state.

Yet it is just this peril which is coming upon the world apace—the peril of a German peace procured, in the course of two or three years, through International Socialist agencies.

No other than a German peace can come out of the Socialist parties of the present. The Socialists of today believe in Germany; in German economic and political doctrine; in the efficiency of the German state; in the general superiority of the German Socialist mind and leadership. Thus any peace made by International Socialists, as their parties are now constituted, will be the handiwork of German believers—of men such as Troelstra of Holland, of Longuet and Cachin of France, of Henderson and MacDonald of England. Any peace made by these leaders will be, no matter what they say to the contrary, a German peace. It will professedly be a peace made upon the basis of international justice and goodwill—and if it were such a peace in fact, then we could work for its coming and welcome its appearance. But it will be nothing of the kind; it will be a peace inspired and formed by the German mind—a peace formed unto the German conception of international justice and goodwill; a peace made in Germany as well as for Germany. For just as the fetish and superstition of German authority and superiority is over International Socialism, so a conception of the inferiority and incapacity of all other nations is regnant in the minds of its German high priests. And this Germanized Socialism, this Germanized internationalism, is Germany's first-chosen agency for still winning the war—if she has not already won it through the delinquent peace of Paris.

No, the Peace must not be remade by the International Socialism of today—Socialism itself must be remade ere it can be trusted by the peoples. As certainly as the bankruptcy of sheer capitalism has been demonstrated by the war and the Paris Conference, so certainly has the intellectual incapacity and moral infidelity of existing International Socialism been demonstrated; the political and spiritual incompetence of its materialist philosophy and tactic are manifoldly manifest. Not unto such forces as these can the democratic hope and the new social creation be committed.

ANOTHER important if not equally powerful agency for yet procuring a German peace is Germany's organized economic penetration. This was incredibly universal before the war; it continued during the war; it proceeds now.

What we of the Allied nations so fatally fail to realize is the fact that Germany is prepared to cope with even the most disastrous defeat, and with the most drastic peace based upon that defeat. She has long ago prepared for defeat—she is today preparing for defeat—as thoroughly as she was previously preparing for war. The machinery of her industry is unharmed, ready for operation the moment peace is signed. Her power for quick industrial recuperation is immeasurably greater than she has led us to believe, or than we have foreseen. The gates of the East will be open to her, no matter what happens in Russia. Her commercial agents, who are always diplomatic agents also, are today active in Warsaw, in Moscow, in Teheran, in Kabul, in Peking; nor are they absent from France and Italy, from England and America. Along the cross-ways of Switzerland, commercial intercourse between Germany and Allied countries has been proceeding since the signing of the armistice. Great capitalist interests of the Allied countries, as well as of Spain and Holland and Switzerland, though listed in other than German names, are really German property. German efficiency, in this field of economic penetration and exploitation, coupled with intrigue in the domestic affairs of all nations, is beyond anything within the range of our Anglo-Saxon perspicacity or practice. It is a fact we have ignored, but a fact we shall have to face and to challenge. It is a fact that may, if evaded and unchallenged, occultly transmute the Allied victory into a German domination of Europe and Asia and Africa. Germany counts upon this efficiency for the accomplishment of just this end.

VIII

BUT we shall meet none of the ways or weapons of this new German menace by mere proclamation or suppression. The German commercial efficiency can be dealt with only by a more highly energised efficiency of our own. The peril that inheres in the German mind of International Socialism cannot be met by the attempted suppression of Socialist movements or leaders. It can only be met by openly and tolerantly debating, with both these and other leaders and movements, the whole international future.

In fine, the new and greater German peril, pregnant with possible German world-dominion, can be met only by a renascent and anointed democracy, arisen and resolute through all the nations that have been with Germany at war, co-operating with the incipient German democracy so highly championed by such men as Muehlton, Foerster and Schlieben—even by such as Bernstein and Haase.

IX

SO often, in the course of the war, and with little effect I fear, I tried to explain that the war would only begin when the war ended. The Great War is but a prelude to a greater war; and this greater war—the war between Germanism and democracy—now spreads its vaster and more fateful fields.

It is identical with the war between reactionary capitalism and democracy. For the reactionary capitalism of the Allied nations, if it succeed not in the utter political destruction of Germany and the seizure of German industry and trade, will straightway ally itself with a counter-revolution in Germany, making the restored Prussian power its citadel. It is altogether to the interests of the international money-lenders, of the mobilized Ancient Appetites, to restore and preserve an autocratic Germany. Reactionary international capitalism will turn to this, in the end—in fact is already revolving this program; already tentatively planning its fulfilment.

NOR is Germanism the only menace democracy will have to discern and withstand. The forces of disintegration, all roughly bearing the name of Bolshevism, will malifically assail the movements making for democratic reconstruction. Nor only in the rear, but from every side, will Bolshevism seek to undermine the ground beneath the democratic advance. And all these disintegrating movements will, for the time being, work in alliance with Germany.

So, thus beset by the forces making for the class autocracy of the Bolshevist,—and each of these forces the deadly enemy of the truly socialised and democratic man,—each the deadly enemy of freedom and the human soul,—so, thus encirclingly beset, must an emboldened and purified democracy go forth to conquer and create the new world for which all the baffled generations of men have waited, and for which the tribes and the nations now stretch forth worn and appealing hands.

But who, or what, is sufficient for these things? God knows, not I. But that both sufficiency and efficiency are embryo in our democracy, and that they are appointed to birth and to love's lordship of society,—this I believe. I am beset, even in this darkest hour, with a great hope, not passive but active and vigilant, and sometimes ascending into ineffable faith, that out of this evil time will arise a world-citizenry, gifted with a wise and universal good-will, and altogether able for the creation of a noble and beautiful world-order.

I have glimpsed, I think, from my watch upon Europe's quaking walls, an impending freedom and fraternity, that would, if laid hold of, overpay the world for the war's worst woes. An earth wherein the nations choose righteousness for their portion, wherein they choose each other's good, and each of them replete with the peace and the progress which righteousness begets, this is at least,—is at last,—humanly possible. Beyond this evil time, and in plain view, if our sight be cleansed for the vision, outspreads the Canaan of our ageless quest—that providential society, that immortal community of nations, that candor and equality of opportunity, that democracy and fraternity in the exercise of power, that beatification of all labor and all being, that common reverence for each soul and all service, which the heart of the world desires, and which the justice of love provides.

THE JUDGMENT DAY OF DEMOCRACY

THE JUDGMENT DAY OF DEMOCRACY*

I

I SHALL strive to sketch for you, though roughly and hastily I fear, somewhat of the world-drama of today as I behold it. I shall not try to pass judgment on this movement or that, but rather try to foreshadow the oncoming conflict between the concentrating capitalist control of society and the revolutionary movements generally classed under the head of Bolshevism; and then to urge the test, the supreme and perhaps last opportunity, which this conflict sets before democracy.

The great war through which we have passed—so terrible in its effects as to be beyond mortal calculation—is none the less but a prelude to the greater struggle at hand. It is upon the real drama that the curtain is about to ring up; and it is a drama so predestinative and cosmical as to place the war in the category of the incidental. It is to give you a clue to the drama, to appraise as best I can its prophetic values,—hoping thus to enable you to form your own judgment and make your own decisions,—that I am now before you.

II

THE present activities of mankind are staged in what we commonly call the capitalist mode of production and distribution. There are remnants and strata of earlier societies, it is true—especially of feudalism. But, on the whole, human society as it is now constituted, and in all its processes, its rewards and opportunities, is embosomed in the profit-maker's ownership of industry. And, according to the old political economist, and also according to the possessing or privileged classes, this private possession and exploitation of the world's productive opportunities, of its machinery and materials, stimulates the greatest initiative; procures the largest industrial development and safest social administration; and achieves the best general human results.

I hardly need to say to an audience of university students that capitalism, involving as it does the final social control, logically and inevitably becomes the directive force of the world's governments and governors.

It inevitably comes about, too, under this system of production, that the owners of the world's capital control the world's sources of information. The public press, owned by the dominant interests, naturally conveys the news of the day in such forms and with such editorial comment as serve those interests. Likewise the institutions of the church, Catholic and Protestant alike, materially dependent as they are, are compelled, even though unconsciously, to support the views and interests of the owners and to distrust and discredit the movements and voices of organized or militant labor. The same is true of university teaching, especially in countries like America, where universities are privately endowed. Indeed, in whatever mental sphere we move, a last analysis will show that the owners of the world's raw materials, of its tools of production and means of distribution, are the actual if occult creators and directors of the world's state of mind. Even the action of mobs, of seemingly incoherent revolutions such as those in Mexico, or of the struggle between the Bolshevik and the Omsk governments in Russia, are ordered and directed by the capitalist—though the bridled and saddled revolutionist knows it not.

It also comes about that, up to the stage of intelligent and purposeful revolution and the willing self-sacrifice of whole peoples upon the revolutionary altar, they who control production possess a fearful and perverting power over the peoples whose lives depend thereupon. This power may extend even unto the issues of life and death—the life and death of the soul as well as of the body. The man who owns a manufacturing plant upon which three hundred men depend for their bread, and to which owner they are forced to sell their labor or starve, measurably owns the men. They may refuse to work for one owner and sell their labor to another; but that does not change the fact that to be forced, at the point of starvation, to sell one's labor to another man is to be forced to sell one's mind and body into a substantial servitude. He who owns my bread owns me—unless I choose to die rather than be owned.

I am not, for the moment, condemning this capitalist control: I am not debating whether or no any other system be possible or practicable: I am merely trying to state the system.

III

NOW the war, the conclusions of which are still being debated and confounded at Paris, has precipitated the definitive crisis of capitalist society. It is capitalism that is on trial, so far as the peoples are concerned, at the Peace Conference—if such we may accomodately call it; and it is the political and spiritual incompetence of capitalism, already demonstrated by the war, that is being more decisively demonstrated by the incredible incapacity of the Conference to procure peace for the peoples, or to read the doom now written on all the present world's walls.

The capitalist society is now the stage whereon the world-drama I have bespoken shall be performed—a drama in which all human beings shall become at once spectators and actors.

The conflict whose scenes are about to be unrolled concerns and includes our whole planetary existence. It is a conflict between the respective principles of democracy and those of a proletarian dictatorship. On the side of democracy the conflict is for the transformation or democratization of society; those who follow the idea of a proletarian dictatorship seek the present society's destruction, expecting the rise of a new and juster society upon the ruins.

In now presenting to you, as clearly and quickly as I can, a picture of this conflict, of the supreme human opportunity which it imposes, I have gathered what I have to say under the title, "The Judgment Day of Democracy."

IV

I DO not need to attempt a definition of democracy. No man can present a definition to which another will exactly agree. Moreover, our difficulty is enormously enhanced by the fact that we have no democratic experience, upon a large scale, to which to appeal.

It is as true as it is commonplace to say that essential Christianity has never been tried; and it is equally true that democracy has never been tried. Just as there has never been a Christian society, a Christian civilisation, so there has existed no such thing as a democratic state or social order. We have had historic Christianity: we have grown accustomed to democratic phrases: but historic Christianity has little to do with Christ and the so-called democratic states have little to do with democracy. The teachings of Christ have never been applied to world-organisation; society has never been democratically administered. The nations, or rather the governments, which have clothed themselves and their constitutions in democratic phraseology have no notion of what democracy means, no intention of putting Christ into social and industrial practice.

V

WHATEVER its possible variations as to form, democracy posits a state or society which, in all its scope and activities, provides equality of opportunity and freedom of choice for each individual. It does not imply equality in the communistic sense, either materially or theoretically. It does not mean equality of possessions; equality of intellectual or moral conception; equality of spiritual outlook or physical stature. In the democratic society, one man might choose to hoard his share of the social product for a period of years, in order to be free to travel, to write songs or poems, or to pursue some other end in later life. Another might choose to spend his share of the social product day by day, under the knowledge that, if he faithfully serve society through his mature years, society will be equally faithful to him in his concluding years.

No, the equality implicit in democracy is not arithmetical or mechanical. While it means cooperation in production and distribution, association in administration, it also means the right of each man to choose and do the work that he likes best, and to have personal possessions wherewith to express himself. It means that each man must be economically and socially free to discover and fulfil his own life, in so far as the living of his own life does not destroy or restrict the right and the power of others to like choice and fulfilment. A true democracy would indeed invite, would invoke, the largest variety of individual being and experience. It would regard each life as something precious to the whole and the whole as inviolably responsible for each. Democracy, thus realised, would present a world of happy and accordant differences, of unending social and spiritual surprise, in contrast with the monstrous monotony and mediocrity now universally existent.

Democracy conceives of the individual man as the supreme common concern; conceives that it is for the guaranteeing of the full development of each individual that men ought to associate themselves together in mutual groups called the state. And the democratic conception is true: a civilisation has actual worth, it has a right to exist indeed, only according to the measure that it liberates and resources the individual soul for the conquest of liberty and life. This enablement of each man to achieve his freedom and to become a manifest son of God is, so far as we know, what our universe is for. And only so far as the state to this end works with God, has it any part with democracy.

In democratic theory, the state is created, is constantly ordered and controlled, by the common will. A truly democratic state can never be static but fluid—in a constant process of upward change and unfoldment.

Now you students are well aware that, as I have already declared, a democratic state has never existed. Perhaps the two nearest past approaches to democracy have been the Athenian state in the time of Pericles—and this notwithstanding the existence of slavery—and the early Saxon communities of England around and before the time of Alfred the Great. In a limited sense, the streets of Athens and the Saxon Wittenagemote were democratic. And the Swiss Confederation, too, is a modern approach to the democratic idea. But what we are accustomed to call the great democracies are democratic in no true or essential sense; and it is only the sheerest illusion,—an illusion pregnant with universal woe and confusion at that,—to call these European and American states democratic.

VI

THE mere fact of universal suffrage does not at all assure a democratic government. England has achieved, in the course of the centuries, a large measure of freedom. Yet England has ever been governed by a privileged or ruling class; which class, controlling the electoral and governmental machinery, has always had its way and imposed its will upon the people. France is a bureaucratic republic and far from being a democracy. The American republic has always been plutocratic in its political texture and procedure, in its social mentality and morality. The constitution of the United States, so far from being an instrument to enable the peoples to govern themselves, was avowedly and successfully devised (by Alexander Hamilton and those associated with him) with the idea of preventing such political self-government; of keeping the government in the hands of the great possessors. Even Switzerland, notwithstanding its democratic approach, has still far to go before becoming actually democratic.

Consider this: in every one of the so-called democratic countries, a large majority of the peoples, if today given opportunity and effectual choice, would vote for immediate social reforms. But no government is largely enacting these reforms. I am not, for the moment, discussing whether it be peoples or governments that are right: I only want to point out that, until government and people are identical—(and they are not anywhere identical)—no such thing as a democratic state exists. And so far are they from being identical, that, although both the labor and the intelligence of the so-called democracies are clamorous for social reconstruction, the possessing or governing class in each, manipulating the electoral and governmental machinery in occult ways the peoples do not understand and do not yet know how to change, are powerful enough to prevent: the possessors and their political servants are powerful enough to refuse the peoples an opportunity to choose.

THE failure of democracy is not due to theoretical flaws, but to the fact, as I have already said, that its theory has never been put into practice. Democracy has never functioned itself in the state, in society, in industry. There exist no institutional organs wherethrough democracy can effectuate itself.

But, furthermore, the failure of democracy, up till now, is in part due to the philosophical and moral stupidity of its advocates: in treating the political life of man as something apart from either his economic or his spiritual life, they have never recognized the foundation fact of our planetary existence—namely, that the life of man is divinely one and indivisible. Mankind is one organism, economic, political, intellectual, spiritual. Life cannot be divided into compartments. Neither the political nor the spiritual man can be dealt with apart from the economic man; nor the economic apart from the spiritual or political.

Life can only be dealt with as a whole, as a divine and indivisible unity.

Thus you cannot have a democratic state without a democratized industry, a democratized order of education, a democratized sociality and morality. You cannot be an autonomous individual in the spiritual sphere, in the political sphere, and be a coerced or enslaved individual in the economic or social sphere. You cannot have your body enslaved and your soul free; nor can you have your soul enslaved and your body free. You cannot anywhere have democracy, you cannot anywhere have freedom, you cannot anywhere have truth, you cannot anywhere have organizing and administrative love, without having these living forces or substances operative everywhere.

You cannot have democracy in the state unless the total exercise of social power is democratized.

Democracy must be applied to the totality of man's life and activity or it cannot be at all.

Hence democracy must repent of its flamboyant phrases, of its hesitations and scepticisms,—of hypocrisies now guilty of the blood of a hundred million humans, ere the final roll be called,—must repent, and immediately enter upon the conquest of life. It must depart from the diabolic dualism that has rendered it so faithless and futile. It must rid itself of compartmental notions of life, and scale the entire octave of man's associative procedure and common interest. Not only industry—to which we have not yet begun to apply the democratic principle—not only the processes of production and distribution, but our arts and our sciences, our social moods and habits, our religions and moral codes, and whatsoever faith the soul follows, these must all pass into the democratic communion.

It is into this actual democracy, consisting of self-governing and equally empowered and autonomous individuals, that our planetary evolution must now proceed. This, or else the very word democracy will become a derision upon the earth.

VIII

DEMOCRACY has failed thus far, because it has been faithless; because it has never, in a single crisis, kept faith with itself or with the peoples whom it pretended to possess and direct. And it is due to democracy's faithlessness that today mankind paralytically halts between two autocracies: that of the reactionaire and concessionaire on the one side, that of the Bolshevik revolution and dictatorship on the other. And either we must now, through some miracle of understanding and decision, give ourselves over entirely to the democratic experiment, or our democratic theory, our fabled democratic governments, will become as dust before the whirlwind of retribution soon overtaking our alike faithless Christianity and faithless democracy: for it is, I repeat, the like faithlessness of these two that has brought us into the veritable hell wherein we and all the world now wander in hopeless astonishment or unintelligible struggle.

THE stage is set for the conflict. We are beholders of democracy's last chance to conquer, to penetrate, and to organize our life and institutions. Has democracy any inner spirit or native power wherewith to regenerate itself, first of all, and then to lay hold of existing structures of society and redeem and transform them?

The question stands forth before the peoples, sharply defined and imperative, investing the international wilderness, the universal reek and ruin, with a divine and predestinative purpose.

The question must be answered. We cannot stay where we are; society is already dissolving; and only a great democratic revival, springing out of the Divine Spirit perennial in the human soil, can change the world's dissolution into the world's new birth.

Nor need we wait for political action, in order to begin the transformation. I imagine the political state will play the lesser part in both the initiation and the administration of the new society. The state is incompetent—incompetent in industrial and social spheres—when it comes to act for the democratic man. Even now, the notion of society as political is becoming obsolete.

Nor would the socialist state proposed by Marx be less incompetent, so far as the soul is concerned, nor less tyrannical—in fact it would be more incompetent, more tyrannical—than the plutocratic state. The way into democracy, into a free and juster order, lies not in substituting a Frankenstein collective autocracy, inevitably destructive of all that makes the soul's existence worth while, for the sheer financial autocracy under which we now plot and grope adown the ways of death and universal darkness.

The way into democracy is through the voluntary and administrative co-operation of industrial and commercial capital with associated labor. It is possible, by such co-operation, to convert every manufacturing plant, every organization and highway of transportation, every business house, every university, and indeed every sphere of associative activity, into a happy and life-giving democracy. The entire processional of production and distribution might thus be made sacramental; might be made the means of abundant and ever-enlarging life for each individual; might be made the vehicle of each man's liberation for spiritual adventure and increase.

There is no need, I say, to wait. Every employer, every labor union, can move in the democratic direction at once. Many experiments will have to be made, many unforeseen and incalculable difficulties will have to be overcome. But the difficulties of moving into the democratic communion are as nothing compared to the difficulties of staying outside that communion. It is not the experimental advance into the new world—it is the present reactionary halt in the old world—that forebodes the centuried collapse of humanity.

The democratic evolution of industry and trade may ultimately discard whom we know as the employer; but his place will remain as administrator. Social administration will gradually supersede the unhappy profiteer, as well as the archaic political state. The organisation and leadership of each sphere of collective life and action, the functioning of each social need and its fulfilment, will be in the hands of the experts—of those who are the true intellectual and spiritual chieftains. The poverty and puerility, the meanness and ignorance, the intellectual and moral anarchy, the total incompetency indeed, of the present politico-capitalist government of society will thus be progressively scrapped and gladly forgotten.

And all this would be soon—if the peoples but knew how their world is managed. If the peoples but realised with how little brains the world is governed, of how it is governed without scruple or sense or soul, they would lose not a day in building the highway into the democratic and hence Christly society.

There would have to be co-ordination of all social interests and groups, it is true. And it is for this the state would remain; but it would cease to be political in the present sense of that word, and its headship would rest with the men of the largest intellectual and spiritual competency—men who would be, like Moses, at once envisioned prophets and keen practical administrators.

OVER against this possible and importunate democracy, in red battle-lines arrayed, is the Bolshevist revolution, proposing the destruction of the capitalist society and the erection in its stead of a proletarian dictatorship.

Tactically, Bolshevism is an inversion of Prussianism. It proposes, as Prussianism does, to impose its order and culture upon the world by sheer might—but by might proceeding from the bottom instead of from the top.

Nor is the tactic of Bolshevism only superficially Prussian: its practical procedure, as now manifested, starts from the very soul of Prussia. Bolshevism is a demonstration of Hegelianism: it is logical Marxism: it is amplified militarism: it is the apotheosis of materialism. And thus is it the opposite pole of democracy: thus is it the antithesis of essential socialism.

Moreover, just as a truly democratic or a truly socialist society would be the living body of the Christ-spirit, with each of its members infinitely enabled and free, so an effectuated Bolshevik society, if patterned upon its present program of procedure, would be the embodiment of the anti-Christ spirit, with each of its members infinitely and deathfully enslaved.

If the apocalyptic idea of the Antichrist, or of Satan appearing as an angel of light, were fulfilled, it would be something like this: Satan would seize upon some great general yearning for social deliverance, some great messianic impulse making for a new and heavenlier society—a yearning and an impulse that, gathering into round revolt, were about to sweep the world—and he would diabolize this revolt with a false force, a false promise, a false glory, making it appear indeed messianic to the world's despairing disinherited. And indeed this is precisely what Satan—using the word accommodatively—has done by creating the Bolshevik peril and despotism out of the yearning, elementarily righteous and social, of a great people. The allurements and menace of Bolshevism lie in the very fact that it springs from an impulse primarily just—even Christian.

The protest of the enslaved and slain peoples is none other than the protest of the Slain Lamb of the Apocalypse. And it is the Bolshevist's seizure and perversion of this primarily divine protest that gives unto Bolshevism its Antichrist character.

And that the poor and the powerless, that those who produce all and have nothing, should at last turn to sheer economic and military might as their only way and weapon of liberation,—this merely demonstrates that they have accepted the degradation of the rich. The meek have been deceived and betrayed by the methods of the mighty.

Indeed, it is the mighty who have loosed the Bolshevist tide upon the world, in order to ride it to their own ends. It was Germany, first, that commissioned and anointed Bolshevism for the destruction of the nations, plotting the establishment of a German world upon the ruins which the Bolshevist had wrought. It has always been the method of Germanism to undermine the world's moral and social foundations, in order to make way for a German foundation and superstructure instead. And Bolshevism follows the same method, seeking first the destruction of the capitalist world, then of the democratic hope, in order thence to lay Bolshevist foundations whereon to build a Bolshevist world-structure.

Then, secondly, it is the long delay on the part of the Peace Conference, the lack of any definite policy toward Russia, combined with the secret intrigues carried on by financiers and nursery diplomats, that opened the gates for the Bolshevist propaganda throughout the world.

Nor can the Bolshevist program of destruction be met by destruction—it is never by mere destruction that destruction is destroyed. We can only meet the Bolshevist menace by immediate and constructive democracy. It is only by a democratic organization of life and labor of man, of the totality of social power and control, that the Bolshevist destruction of civilisation can be transmuted or dissolved. Only an understanding democracy can cope with and conquer the Bolshevist revolution and fulfil the promise, the righteous yearning, which Bolshevist leadership has seized and betrayed.

Nor must we imagine that the military overthrow of the Soviet Government of Russia will arrest the forces making for the Bolshevik revolution. The capture of Moscow and Petrograd by the army of Koltchak will accomplish no more than a scattering of the Soviet seed abroad. The Bolshevik idea is traversing and permeating the tribes and the nations.

XI

HENCE the crisis of the world is once more at hand. Again are we standing at the cross-roads of our planetary destiny. Soon, mayhap all too soon, will it be seen whether our human pilgrimage shall start decisively upward, or betake itself down a long and steep decline. It is between a total democratic reconstruction and an utter Bolshevist destruction that the nations must now make decision. They must decide quickly, too; for to delay and to doubt is to decide for destruction, whether they will or no.

Will you, therefore,—you who claim to be the democratic peoples,—will you at last keep faith with your ancient promise, so long unfulfilled? Will you now, first ascending anew and forever unto your ideal, and then through the sacramental use of earth's natural resources and social machines, through the conversion and consecration of production and distribution, begin now the creation of a world-order wherein men shall in truth be equally free, equally advantaged, and every child heir of life's total opportunity?

Nor think it is merely the Bolshevik who challenges our democracy. It is the very challenge of God that calls from the midst of the Bolshevik advance. The Bolshevik movement is but the rude and red John Baptist, crying to our democracy out of the wilderness the war has wrought. "Repent ye or perish!"—this is the menace and message of Bolshevism to the nations which, calling themselves democratic and Christian, yet helplessly halt in this foul and universal impasse of stark political and spiritual incompetence.

And let me say this: if there were no indigenous remedy for the present state of things; if the individual and national egoisms and cupidities, if the general wickedness and governmental stupidity, which have brought us to our present plight were immedicable; if there were no inner spirit or native sense that could change the course which history has hitherto pursued,—then it were better that the present world be destroyed, or be resolved back into its primary elements.

This frightful and fraudulent civilisation cannot continue. God will not stand the sight of such a world any longer. Already its foundations are rocking, and we have not an hour to lose, if we would have the world saved. We must choose, and choose now, to put the democracy we profess into practice, to render socially incarnate the Christ we call Lord, or we must expect the visitation of that consuming fire which the apostle inscribed as the "wrath of the Lamb"—the wrath of a Divine Love so outraged by the horror and meanness of things that it will endure them no further. And this wrath of the Lamb, this intolerably outraged Divine Love, if so it be loosed upon the earth, will leave no stone upon another of our unclean and blood-guilty civilisation. And mayhap not for a generation, not for a hundred years, shall be born a mankind equal to that cleaner and kindlier civilisation, that manful and songful society,—certain one day to arise upon earth,—which St. John saw as the New Jerusalem coming down out of heaven, and wherein our renascent human life, our total planetary activity, proceeds radiantly and commonly in the bosom of God.

XII

UPON you young men of this ancient and honored university, upon the youth of this Switzerland wherein democracy has made its nearest approach to realisation, I would lay the burden of the world-crisis, and also the vision of the City of God.

For it may be that those whom we call the great democratic peoples shall hesitate until the choice is gone by forever; that the wrath of the Lamb must needs consume this vindictive and parasitic society, with its hopelessly corrupted and corrupting institutions, ere the new world can come into being. And it may be that this Switzerland shall arise as the one green island of hope amidst a world rendered utterly desolate, ere the abomination of abominations be swept away.

But even if mankind erstwhile deeply sinks into tremendous and appalling night, even if the world become awhile a jungle,—the prowling place of spiritual and physical terrors unimaginable,—the World-Keeper will walk therein, ever redemptive and ever-creative; and therein you may walk with him,—and work with him,—until the dreadful night dissolve in the dawn of the nobler society.

So upon you may come such a burden of opportunity and vision, such an ineffable affair of the world, as perhaps never came to the youth of any time or clime. The bearing of this burden, your responsibility to this vision, will compel you to an adventure, to a holy quest, such as man hath never entered upon. And thereupon entering, you will become the fortunate soldiers—goldenly fortunate, no matter what price you have to pay—of what is perhaps mankind's final chance, and only a fighting chance at that, of at last becoming commonly adequate and divinely free. Yea, more than that, you share in God's fighting chance—for mayhap it is only a fighting chance God has—of unfolding a creation which shall be as the land, the fulfilled desire, of his infinitely human heart.

THE DEATH of MRS. HERRON.

Poca gioia ha nell'urna....*

We regret to announce the death of Mrs. Carrie Rand Herron, wife of Prof. George D. Herron, the eminent American sociologist and poet.

Some years ago, leaving the United States, Mr. and Mrs. Herron settled in Florence in their beautiful mansion, Villa Primola, once the historical abode of Benivieni, the poet friend of Savonarola, and one of the most charming spots on the lovely slopes of the Fiesole hills.

To this artistic milieu and most inspiring environment the poet and thinker had come seeking in the balm of our climate benefit for his impaired health, and in this classical and picturesque part of Florence he had desired to dedicate himself together with his noble minded companion to a life of love and work blessed with ideal and spiritual happiness.

It was not to be. Fate, obscure and mysterious in its aims, seemed to have enhanced happiness and bliss for a few years only to render more tragic the break of an ideal love.

Mrs. Carrie Rand Herron, who after a painful illness passed away last Sunday in the flower of her life, was a woman of unusual accomplishments and a musician of considerable talent, nor was an excessive modesty able to hide the qualities of her gifted mind and the genuine gold of her heart, no matter though she had
